Minister Heads Party TOKYO, June 13 (A) - Japan's wartime foreign minister who signed the surrender on the Missouri nearly seven years ago today became president of the new 'Kaishinto' (progressive) party. Mamoru Shigemitsu, the only major Japanese war criminal who has completed his prison term and been cleared for public office, immediately called for a welfare state and limited rearmament.

The veteran diplomat, who was Japan's ambassador in London at the time of Pearl Harbor, urged a two-party system in Japan patterned after those of the United States and Great Britain.

Shigemitsu said the Progressive party should bring together all progressive elements in Japan "with the exception of the Communists and the fellow-travelers.' His party aims at being the principal opposition to Prime Minister Shigeru Yoshida's predominantLib-

Interpreting The News Mz. Farmers

By J. M. ROBERTS, JR.

Associated Press News Analyst Porter McKeever is a young man of high capabilities, a crusader for the theory that nations as well as people should do what is right, who has done an excellent public relations job for the American delegation to the United Nations. He is leaving that job in disillusionment, feeling that the United States is by-passing the U. N. He says there is a trend in Washington to ignore the organization.

Yet his speech might have been more timely if made three years ago. At that time the U. N. had just demonstrated its complete inability to handle such matters as the Berlin blockade, although it did provide the lounge in which settlement negotiations eventually began. U. S. authorities felt at the time that the U. N. was merely a facade for an idea which would have been fine if it had worked: that it was important as a meeting place for East and West might some day prove of value, but that it was no good in the cold war except for propaganda. McKeever argues that this might not have been true had the U. N. not already been weakened through being by-passed on such matters as the Truman doctrine (the beginning of the containment program), the Marshall Plan, Point Four, the North Atlantic Treaty and the like.

He thinks the trend has continued in refusal by the U.S. out of deference for her Allies, to let Colonial problems such as Tunisia and Morocco come up for discussion. He now has the agreement of practically everybody that this was wrong.

On many of these things, however, the U.S. was actually acting to preserve the U. N. and still get things done which could not be done any other way. Perhaps, it would have been better to use the U. N. for the direct purpose of strengthening it. But on the U. N. record, Congress was not going to hand over either the money or the control for Greek-Turkish aid, the Marshall Plan and the other things. The people wouldn't have stood for it. And there was also the distinct fear that attempting to force such programs through the U. N. might have meant the final with-drawal of the Communist world from the U. N. and all communi-

In the meantime, the U. S. was using the U. N. informally if not formally as the focal point of its developing coalitions and alliances with the peace-seeking nations. The U.S. was bearing by far the major cost of keeping the U. N. alive. It was using the U. N. for the vastly important attempts to secure atomic agreement. It had used the U. N. to drive Russia out of Iran, and for scores of other purposes. And when the chips were down, when Communist aggression took the form of direct warfare in Korea, the U. N. became the master key for U. S. policy. For the first time the free nations of the world demonstrated that they were ready to fight for peace and for democratic principles in an area which meant little or nothing to any of them, either militarily or economically. This was followed immediately by other U. S. sponsored measures to strengthen the U. N. The General Assembly was given power to act where the nations had previously been hamstrung by the Security Council Veto. Steps were taken to give the organization a police force of its own to take care of future

Men under the U. N. flag stopped the Communists in Korea. U. N. negotiators seek a true. Perhaps the United Nations in New York should have been the center of consultations between the Allies regarding conduct of the war, instead of Washington. Embassies, rather than the U. N. Council tables, have monopolized

Nevertheless, if you are going to discuss trends, and who is responsible, Korea is certainly outstanding evidence in judging the standing of the U. N. in U. S. foreign policy, and in the world.
